vacation of Congress. He says it authorizes suspension during vacation for certain specific reasons, and, as far as I can discern, a strict and fair interpretation of its provisions will not allow removal during the vacation, except for reasons warranting suspension during vacation, but that office-holders have political views different from those of the administration, during and, therefore, of course, not for removal. It may be noted in this connection that he has made but one removal, all his other nominations having been for vacancies. The paper in the case of King, head of the Engineering Bureau of the Navy Department, read: "In place of B. F. Jaggerwood, whom I desire to remove,

would remain in other cases, but in this case he would choose to do so is a question he alone can answer. It can also be stated that the views of the President were communicated at the cabinet meeting yesterday, and were endorsed by all the members. The President is well aware that many public men want him to give a definite answer.
